Invitations Issued for White House Musicals.

DANCE AT TURKISH EMBASSY

A. Rustem Bey, Charge d'Affaires, Proves an Entertaining Host, Receiving the Patronage of Washington's Social Leaders at His First Function—Personal Notes.

The President and Mrs. Taft have issued invitations for a musicale on Friday evening, February 11.

Mrs. Taft, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Anderson, and the President's aunt, Miss Della Torrey, of Massachusetts, both of whom are guests at the White House, occupied a box at the National Theatre yesterday afternoon to see Maud Allan, the dancer, with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. The Russian Ambassador and Baroness Rosen and their daughter were in another box.

The charge d'affaires of Turkey, A. Rustem Bey, gave the first dance last night ever given by that government, for it was really the government that was host through its representative. The charge d'affaires is a bachelor and has grown very popular in Washington society. He is a young man of delightful manners, and speaks delightful English. He dances well, plays cards, and is fond of all the amusements which young American society people are fond of. He has been entertained almost constantly since the Ambassador went abroad, and has already been host at a number of small dinners. The new Turkish government has appropriated generous funds for the purpose of entertaining in their embassies and legations.

Baroness des Planches, wife of the Italian Ambassador, received the guests with the host, in the main drawing room. The only decorations in the embassy were pink and white roses in the white and gold drawing room, which were very effective, and the same flowers were used on the table from which a buffet supper was served during the evening. There was no cotillion and no favors. Between the regular dances, there were pretty figures danced. Cards were enjoyed between dances. The guests included the Vice President and Mrs. Sherman, the Secretary of the Treasury and Mrs. MacVeagh, the Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Meyer, the Secretary of War and Mrs. Dinkley, Postmaster General Hitchcock, the Italian Ambassador, the Austrian Ambassador and Baroness Hagedorn, the Russian Ambassador and Baroness Rosen, the British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce, the Portuguese Minister, the Viscount d'Alte, the Swedish Minister and Mme. de Lagercrantz, the Norwegian Minister and Mme. BROKEN HOMES BLAMED.

Judge De Lacy Talks Before the Kindergarten Association.

To broken homes, Judge De Lacy, of the Juvenile Court, last night, declared before the Kindergarten Association of the District of Columbia, the greater number of children's troubles to be due. He asked the members, women teachers for the most part, who had gathered in the Business High School to hear him, to exercise the utmost patience with the children who came within their care. Judge De Lacy told of the methods he used with the children brought into his court.

"The girl problem is the hardest to solve," declared the Judge. "Too many people," he explained, "know of her trouble and help her to break her good resolutions."

Judge De Lacy asserted that there is strong need in the District of a detention home for child offenders.

Mrs. Richard Fay Jackson presided at the meeting.

MAUD ALLAN SCORES.

Dance with Russian Symphony Orchestra Programme Pleases.

At the National yesterday Miss Maud Allan and the Russian Symphony Orchestra gave one of the most pleasing and unusual entertainments that it has been the pleasure of the music and dance loving public of this city to witness. It was an entertainment in which everything—music, costumes, dancing, and artistry—combined to delight the ear and eye.

Miss Allan revived the old Greek style of dancing and has brought it to a very high degree of perfection and beauty. In her appearance she shows her study of the figures of the Greek vases that are dug up every now and then, and the graceful curves of her figure, taken together with the simple yet beautiful Greek dress, makes a picture that carries one back to the days of Sparta.

The first of the series of dances that the artist gave was composed of three of Chopin's—two mazurkas—and then she followed these with a mazurka proved to be the most beautifully executed number, with one exception, of the afternoon—Mendelssohn's "Spring Song." Her conception of this, one of the great composer's greatest and most familiar pieces, was exquisite. She interpreted the first part as a chase for a butterfly and the last as a sort of flower dance.

At times she seemed literally to float over the stage, and it was hard to realize that it was dancing at all, so beautifully easy and graceful was it.

Following a selection by the orchestra, she gave a suite from "Peer Gynt," and in the second of these, "The Death of Ase," she gave one of the best exhibitions of what might be called emotional dancing imaginable. Her facial expression was splendid, and the dance was deserving of more applause than it received, for no other reason than the acting that Miss Allan did. Anita's dance, which followed, relieved the tension, with its lightness and gaiety. The last of the suite was "The Dance of the Gnomes," a weird, snake-like, almost grotesque dance, which reminds one of the "Tarantella," danced here by another dancer in the season.

The final numbers on the programme were a hapsessed by Delibes and Strauss' "Beautiful Blue Danube." The latter was especially worthy of notice, and the applause was so great at the conclusion that the dancer was forced to respond with an encore—Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice," another beautifully executed bit of light music.

But Miss Allan was not all of the entertainment. The Russian Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Modest Atschuler, furnished accompaniments which came fully up to the standard set by the dancer. But it was in the overture and intermezzi that they really excelled. The overture was "Mignon," and the leader brought out Thomas' haunting melodies in a masterful manner.

The real musical treat of the afternoon, however, came in the two selections of the Russian composer, Ippolitow-Ivanow. "In the Aul" and the "March Sardanapal." The wild, almost barbaric rhythm of these selections was felt to the full, and one could hardly imagine better rendering than that given by the orchestra. The leader was congratulated on the rendition of these numbers.

The combination of Miss Allan and Herr Atschuler's orchestra is a happy one, and, having heard and seen, no one wonders at the popularity gained abroad.
